Earlier this year, a former deputy assistant secretary of state in the Obama administration told me at the Brookings Institution that his position in the foreign service had made him increasingly pessimistic about the future of American foreign policy. The decision of retired Marine Gen. John Allen -- who played a key role in the Obama administration's handling of the raid that killed Osama bin Laden in 2011 -- to resign in protest at the president's backpedaling on U.S. support for Syrian rebels made the point even more vividly. That moment was emblematic of one of the biggest weaknesses of President Obama's tenure -- one that I believe will plague the next administration as well. Obama is a highly intelligent man, but his worldview isn't based on the truth. His big failure is not a deep ideological misreadiness, but rather a deep and searing self-absorption. He is rarely subject to the kind of disciplined and honest critique that would make him rethink his assumptions. And that raises all sorts of questions about the force of his policies, especially in the Middle East. I believe the first and most obvious of those questions has to do with the administration's failure to develop a clear policy in Syria, a policy that could have achieved Obama's own objective of weakening the so-called Islamic State without deep involvement in the Syrian war. The place Obama chose as his first win in his showdown with the Pentagon was the Central Command, the agency responsible for U.S. military operations around the globe.
