Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to a method of drilling and a process of completion of deep wells and, more particularly, to methods of using a multifunctional completion string. 2. Description of Related Art Deep wells are often drilled using multiple strings of tubular members. Typically, a drill string is used to drill the wellbore to the desired depth, and then a production casing string is run into the wellbore and cemented in place. A perforating gun is then positioned near the production casing so that the perforating gun can penetrate the casing and permit flow of formation fluids into the casing. The perforating gun is loaded, lowered into the casing, and fired to create openings in the casing. After the perforating gun is fired, the perforations formed in the casing can be observed by viewing the casing using a camera and/or using a perforation gun camera. Sometimes, a pressurized fluid such as brine is injected into the wellbore so that there is a compaction of the formation around the wellbore to maintain the integrity of the wellbore and provide hydrostatic control. After the compaction of the formation around the wellbore is complete, a tubular component is positioned within the wellbore, such as a perforating gun carrier. The perforating gun carrier is loaded and positioned within the wellbore, and a perforating gun is lowered into and positioned within the perforating gun carrier. The perforating gun is set in a firing position by rotating the perforating gun into alignment with the perforation gun camera to obtain an image of the perforation gun. The perforating gun is then fired. In some cases, the perforating gun camera may be mounted on an end of the perforating gun to view the perforation gun prior to firing the perforating gun. The perforating gun is lowered and set in the wellbore to create openings in the casing, and the perforations in the casing are observed with a video camera that is located at the surface of the wellbore. In such cases, the video camera is positioned relative to the wellbore to view the perforations in the casing, e79caf774b
